THE GRADUATION CEREMONY

A Brief History

The graduation ceremony is one of great antiquity. Its essential features have been the same since the 12th century when the first universities came into existence. Its necessary constituents are the Chancellor or his or her deputy, the academic staff, the graduands, and the public.

When the Chancellor confers degrees, saying to the graduands: 'By virtue of my authority as Chancellor, I admit you to the degree of ...' those words are a translation of the Latin form used in the Middle Ages. Then, the Chancellor's authority to confer degrees came from the church. The church had a monopoly of education, partly because it was the guardian of true doctrine, and partly because clerics were almost the only people who could read and write. As a result, the only person who could license a teacher was the bishop of a diocese until, under pressure of other business, he deputed the task to his chief secretary or chancellor.

As learning spread, teachers wanted a licence to teach not just in one diocese, but everywhere, and the only person who could give them that was the Pope. The Chancellor's authority, then, came from the Pope. But at the Reformation, Henry VIII assumed for the Crown all the rights which had previously been the Pope's in England. That is why all subsequent universities in England have been created by Royal Charter. It is for this reason also that the Chancellor does not wear ecclesiastical robes, as would have been worn in the Middle Ages, but robes similar to those of the Lord Chancellor of England.

The second group participating in the ceremony is the academic staff. In the 12th century they would all have been called 'masters' or MAs. At that date they were paid no salaries, but hired their own lecture rooms and charged their own fees. But they also formed themselves into a guild or union, which is what universitas originally meant. As in all guilds they were insistent that they, and only they, should determine who should be of their number, and since this involved saying who should be teachers, they soon found themselves in conflict with the Chancellor. In the 13th century they won a great victory when they persuaded the Pope to decree that Chancellors were obliged to confer degrees on all those nominated by the masters. That is why the masters examine the candidates, why the Dean, acting as their spokesperson, reads out the names of those who are to receive degrees, and why the masters at this ceremony watch to see that the Chancellor or his deputy does what is required of him.

Thirdly, the graduands. The word 'degree' comes from the Latin gradus, which means 'a step'. When students are admitted to a Bachelor degree they move one step up towards the mastership. When they are admitted to a masters degree they climb another step and come up on a level with the masters, who then receive them into their guild, or universitas. In the Middle Ages they would then have stayed on the dais, so that their old master could invest them with the symbols of office. But that was only part of the business. The new master had to deliver an inaugural lecture, entertain the whole guild of masters to dinner and preside over disputations for forty days continuously. For that reason, taking one's masters degree was called 'inception', or the beginning of one's career as a master.

The public is the fourth participant. It has an important function because the whole point of the proceedings is that they should be seen and heard by valid witnesses. The public hears the words of the Dean and the Chancellor and sees the new graduates dressed in their respective gowns or robes.

The academic gowns are derived from the everyday dress of the medieval clergy. In the Middle Ages they were not open in front, but closed like a clergyman's cassock. It was in about 1500 that academics had the front opened up so as to display the fine clothes which they were wearing underneath. The hood was the normal medieval headwear, but it soon acquired a coloured lining. By the 17th century, if not earlier, these colours were strictly controlled so that anyone could identify from the colour of a graduate's hood, the university and the degree.

THE UNIVERSITY OF TASMANIA ALUMNI WEST NORTH WEST BURSARY

Thank you for purchasing this souvenir copy of the University of Tasmania Graduation Program. Your kind donation will assist in the finance of the University of Tasmania Alumni, West North West Bursary Scheme.

The West North West Bursary Scheme was promoted by the University of Tasmania Alumni to help redress the low level of participation in higher education in the West and North West of the State.

In many cases the impediment to participation in higher education is the expense of studying at a remote campus and an inability to secure the necessary level of financial support. The Bursary Scheme aims to reduce financial hurdles for students from the region who wish to undertake full time study at any campus of the University.

The Scheme targets talented young students who are financially disadvantaged, including those who do not qualify for Federal or State Government allowances. The Bursary provides a stipend to the recipient of $2500 per year for each year of study. Talented mature age applicants may also be considered.

The University of Tasmania Alumni Committee has given its enthusiastic support to this worthwhile cause and organises fundraising events throughout the year to provide the funds to support the Scheme.

If you would like more details about the WNW Bursary scheme, or wish to make a tax deductible gift towards a Bursary, please contact the Alumni Office on 03 6324 3052 or email Alumni.Office@utas.edu.au
